Cf. med.L. Danigeldum.]

An annual tax imposed at the end of the 10th c. or in the 11th c., originally (as is supposed) to provide funds for the protection of England from the Danes, and continued after the Norman Conquest as a land-tax. Also transf. and fig.

The name is not known to occur in OE., and the actual contemporary notices, beginning with Domesday, are mainly of fiscal character. Bromton (14th c.) calls it 'tallagium datum Danis', apparently identifying it with the gafol or tribute paid to the Danes in 991, and on two subsequent occasions, to buy them off. In the so-called 'Laws of Eadweard' (Schmid 496) it is described as an annual tax to hire mercenaries to resist and put down pirates. This might identify it with the heregyld 'army-tax' levied by the Danish kings to maintain their army and navy (see O.E. Chron. 1039-40), and said to have been afterwards remitted by Edward the Confessor. Mr. Freeman suggests (Norm. Conq. II. App. Q) 'that Denageld was a popular name of dislike, originally applied to the payments made to buy off the Danes, and thence transferred to these other payments made to Danish and other mercenary troops, from the time of Thurkill onwards'. The Danegeld was levied as a land-tax by the Norman kings; it disappears under that name after 1163, but in fact continued under the name of tallage.

2. Hence, The part of England over which this law prevailed, being the district north-east of Watling Street, ceded by the Treaty of Wedmore, 878, or perhaps the Northumbrian territory in Danish occupation.

This use appears explicitly only in modern historians (chiefly under the barbarous forms Dane-lage, Dane-lagh, which are neither Old nor modern English), though founded on ancient passages, such as those of quots. 1050, 1300, in 1. [In Icelandic lög 'law' had, according to Vigfusson, the sense 'law-district', 'almost as a local name' in Gulaþings-lög, þrænda-lög, etc.]

A name for the Dwarf Elder, Sambucus Ebulus.

(The name is found in Turner 1538, but only the earlier name Wallwort or Wellewort, OE. wealwyrt, is given in Sinon. Barthol. of 14th c., and Alphita c 1450; Rous also, who died 1491, in relating the legend, has only the name Walwort; so that the names Danewort, Daneweed, Dane's blood, etc. can hardly have belonged to early tradition. While suggested in part by the abundance of the plant at certain spots historically or traditionally associated with slaughter, there was also an element of fanciful etymology in explaining the Latin name Ebulus from ebullire to bubble forth, with reference to the flowing of blood. See also WALLWORT.)

dapple ('dæp(ə)l), sb. Also 6 dappell. [Unless this is the first element in dapple-grey (q.v.), it is not known until late in the 16th c., being preceded somewhat by examples of the adj. of the same form, and followed by those of the vb. in the simple tenses; the (? ppl.) adj. dappled

however appears two centuries earlier. The mutual relations of these and the derivation and etymological development of the whole group are, from the want of data, still uncertain. The primary meaning of dappled was 'spotted, specked, blotched', which might arise either from a vb. 'to spot' or a sb. = 'spot, blotch'. A possible connexion is the Icel. depill (found in 13th c.) 'spot, dot'; according to Vigfusson 'a dog with spots over the eyes is also called depill'. This is app. a dim. of dapi pool: cf. mod. Norw. dape, depel muddy pool, pond, dub; MLG. dope, dobbe. Thus dapple might perhaps originally mean a 'splash', and, hence, a small blotch or speck of colour.]

dapple-grey ('dæp(ə)lgreɪ), a. (sb.) Forms: 4–5 dappel-, -ul(l-, -il(l-, 6–7 daple-, 5– dapple-grey, -gray. [See DAPPLE sb., a., v. and GREY.

Since dapple-grey occurs nearly two centuries before dapple itself is exemplified in any grammatical capacity (the only form known to be of equal age being the ppl. adj. dappled), it is difficult to conjecture whence or how the compound was formed. In such combinations, the first element is usually a sb.: e.g. in apple-grey, iron-grey, sky-blue, snow-white, etc.; but it is difficult to attach any analogous meaning to 'spot-grey', if we suppose dapple here to be the sb. The Germanic languages generally have a combination meaning 'apple-grey': viz. ON. apalgrár 'dapple-grey, i.e. apple-grey, having the streaky colour of an apple' (Vigfusson), Sw. apel-grå, Norw. apel-graa, Da. abildgraa, pied, piebald; OHG. aphelgrâ 'glaucus' (Grimm), MHG. apfelgrâ, Ger. apfelgrau 'dapple-grey' (Flügel), 'applied to the apple-round spots which show themselves on grey horses' (Grimm), Du. appel-graauw 'dapple-grey'. So F. pommelé (f. pomme apple) marked with roundish spots (of any colour), gris-pommelé grey dappled with darker spots, dapple-grey, pomely grey in Chaucer, C.T. Prol. 616; with which cf. Russ. yablochnyĭ dappled, f. yabloko apple; all said esp. of the coats of horses. It is not easy to believe that 'dapple-grey' which renders these words, has no connexion with 'apple-grey', their actual translation; the explanation may be that dapple-grey was a mixture of DAPPLED spotted, taken as the sense-equivalent of F. pommelé, with apple-grey the formal representative of Norse apal-grâ-, and its Teutonic equivalents. This would account at once for the difficulty in analysing dapple- in this combination, and for its presence here before its appearance as an independent word.]

1. Father Derby's or Darby's bands: app. Some rigid form of bond by which a debtor was bound and put within the power of a money-lender. (It has been suggested that the term was derived from the name of some noted usurer of the 16th c.)

6. Darby and Joan. A jocose appellation for an attached husband and wife who are 'all in all to each other', especially in advanced years and in humble life. Hence dial., a pair of china figures, male and female, for the chimney-piece.

Hence Darby-and-Joan v., -Joanish a.; Darby and Joan club, a club for elderly men and women.

The Gentl. Mag. (1735) V. 153 has under the title 'The joys of love never forgot: a song', a mediocre copy of verses, beginning 'Dear Chloe, while thus beyond measure, You treat me with doubt and disdain', and continuing in the third stanza 'Old Darby, with Joan by his side, You've often regarded with wonder: He's dropsical, she is sore-eyed, Yet they're never happy asunder'. This has usually been considered the source of the names, and various conjectures have been made, both as to the author, and as to the identity of 'Darby and Joan', but with no valid results. It is possible that the names go back to some earlier piece, and as Darby is not a common English surname, it may have originated in a real person. There is also a well-known 19th c. song of the name.

Darcy ('dɑ:sɪ). [The name of H. P. G. Darcy (1803-58), inspector of the Paris waterworks.]

1. Used attrib. and in the possessive to designate concepts arising out of Darcy's work on fluid flow, esp. in Darcy's law, a law governing the flow of fluid through a porous medium, according to which the volume flow per unit cross-sectional area is proportional to the pressure gradient divided by the viscosity of the fluid.

1881 Encycl. Brit. XII. 493/2 (heading) Ganguillet & Kutter's modified Darcy formula. 1931 Physics I. 35 In the case of the flow of liquids through porous media..the empirically established law (D'Arcy law [sic]) that the velocity is proportional to the pressure gradient has been taken as the basis of the hydrodynamics. 1957 Nature 23 Feb. 407/2 The section concerned with underground water devoted most of the sessions to an appreciation of the so-called Darcy's Law and its application and validity over a wide range of ground-water problems. 1972 R. G. KAZMANN Mod. Hydrol. (ed. 2) v. 184 It is only in connection with water flow in the vicinity of discharging wells that..the flow is often turbulent, and Darcy's law does not apply.

2. Written darcy (pl. darcys, darcies). A c.g.s. unit of permeability to fluid flow, being the permeability of a medium that allows a flow of 1 cubic centimetre per second of a liquid of 1 centipoise viscosity under a pressure gradient of 1 atmosphere/centimetre.

1933 R. D. WYCKOFF et al. in Rev. Sci. Instruments IV. 395/2 In view of Darcy's fundamental work in establishing the laws of flow for porous media it has seemed appropriate to name the unit of permeability the darcy. 1971 Bull. Amer. Assoc. Petroleum Geologists LV. 1694/2 Average porosity is about 34%, and average permeability is in excess of 3 darcys. 1975 G. ANDERSON Coring i. 15 The American Petroleum Institute has modified the darcy to standardize its use for the petroleum industry.

It is the sign of fruitfulness in the pear. Ibid., In ordinary circumstances, the dart..swells and adds to itself a rosette of leaves, which gradually increase in number from three to five. Continuing to develop, the dart is finally crowned with seven leaves and is then known as a fruit-spur (lambourde). 1946 Ibid. (ed. 2) 5 We have..adopted the original French spelling of dard and brindille, written in the first English edition dart and brindle—for both the latter have meanings totally unrelated to the objects referred to as dard and brindille. Ibid. 24 The dard is a bud which has not grown beyond a certain point [etc.]. 1951 *Dict. dare (dɛə(r)), v.[1] Pa. t. durst (dɑ:st), dared (dɛərd); pa. pple. dared. Forms: see below. [One of the interesting group of Teutonic preterite-present verbs, of which the extant present is an original preterite tense: see CAN, DOW, etc. OE. durran, pres. dearr, durron, pa. dorste, = OS. gidurran, -dar, -durrun, -dorsta, MLG. doren, dar, doren, dorste, OFris. dûra, (dûr or dor), dorste, OHG. gi-turran, -tar, -turrun, -torsta, pa. pple. gitorran, MHG. turren, tar, turren, torste, subj. törste, Goth. ga-daursan, -dars, -daursun, subj. -daursjau, -daursta: belonging originally to the third ablaut series ders-, dars-, durs-, Aryan dhers-, dhars-, dhrs-: cf. Skr. dhrsh-, perf. dadhārsha, to be bold, Gr. θαρσ-, θρασ- in θρασύς bold, θαρσεῖν to be bold, OSlav. drŭzate to be bold, dare. In ON., the word is wanting, its sense being supplied by the weak verb þora. It is also lost in mod.Ger. and Du.; in MDu. it appears to have run together with the verb dorven, = OE. purfan to need (see THAR); hence in Du., durven is to dare; and Ger. dürfen in some of its uses approaches the sense 'dare'. These two verbs have also fallen together under a d form in some Frisian dialects; and in ME. there was some confusion between them, dar being sometimes written for thar, while, on the other hand, th- forms (some of them at least from Norse) appear with the sense of dar: see A. 9 below.

The original 3rd sing. pres. he dare, and pa. t. durst, remained undisturbed to the modern period, in which the transitive senses (B. II.) were developed; but early in the 16th c. the new forms dares, dared, appeared in the south, and are always used in the transitive senses, and now also in the intransitive sense when followed by ta. In the original construction, followed by the infinitive without to, dare, durst are still in common use (esp. in the negative 'he dare not', 'he durst not'); and most writers prefer 'he dare go', or 'he dares to go', to 'he dares go'. The northern dialects generally retain 'he dare, he durst', and writers of northern extraction favour their retention in literary English when followed by the simple infinitive without to.]

darloch, var. of DORLACH.

darn (dɑ:n), *v.*¹ Forms 7–8 dern, dearn, 7– darn; 9 Sc. dern. [Derivation unknown.

The verb appears about 1600, and becomes at once quite common: it may be that this particular way of repairing a hole or rent was then introduced. The form suggests relationship to DERN (later darn) secret, hidden, and its verb dern, darn to conceal, put out of sight; but satisfactory connecting links between the two have not yet been found. On the other hand the Celtic derivation suggested by Wedgwood is absolutely inadmissible. Welsh darn 'piece, fragment' has no association with darning or mending in any way, and the sense 'patch' given by Owen Pughe is correct only in the sense that a 'piece' may be used to patch. The Welsh darnio hosan would mean 'to cut a stocking to pieces' (with a knife); 'to darn a stocking' is creithio hosan. (D. Silvan Evans, and Prof. Rhŷs.)] thowghter, 5–6 Sc. dochtir, 5–9 Sc. dochter, 6 doughtour, Sc. douchter). β. (6 dial. dahtorr, doffter, 6–7 dafter), 6– daughter (riming with after in Pilgr. Prog., etc.). Plural: see below. [A Com. Teutonic and Common Aryan word of relationship, OE. dohtor (-ur, -er) = OFris. dochter, OS. dohtar (MDu., Du., LG. dochter), OHG. tohter (MHG. tohter, Ger. tochter), ON. dótter (:—dohter), (Sw., Norw. dotter, Da. datter), Goth. dauhtar:—OTeut. dohtēr*; corresp. to pre-Germanic dhuk'tēr* from original dhughə'tēr*, whence Skr. duhitar-, Zend duyδar, Armen. duštr, OSlav. dŭštĭ, Lith. duktė̃: cf. also Gr. θυγάτηρ. Generally referred to the verbal root dhugh-*, Skr. duh- to milk.

The normal modern repr. of OE. dohtor, ME. doȝter, is doughter still used in 16th c., and now represented by Sc. dochter, dowchter, north. Eng. dowter. The form daughter appeared in the 16th c. (substituted in Cranmer's ed. of the Bible for Tindale's and Coverdale's doughter, whence in all later versions, and always in Shakspere and later writers). It appears to be of southern origin, and analogous to the southern phonetic development of bought, sought, thought: a Wells will of 1531 has dahtorrs: cf. the mod. Somerset and Devon ('dɑ:tə(r)).

In OE. the dative sing. was dehter; genitive dohtor (sometimes dehter); the uninflected genitive continued in use to the 16th c. The plural shows a variety of forms, viz. OE. dohtor, -ur, -er (like the sing.), dohtru, dohtra, Northumb. dohter, dohtero; the first of these app. did not survive the OE. stage; the form in -u, -a, is represented in early ME. by Layamon's dohtere, dohtre; but Layamon has also dohtren, which survived in S.W. dialect to 1500. Ormin has dohhtress, and the later text of Layamon dohtres, which is always found in northern ME., and became the standard form. An umlaut plural deȝter appears n the West Midland Alliterative Poems of 14th c. and the Troy-book of c 1400; it occurs elsewhere with inflexional endings, dehtren, deȝteres: cf. brether, brethren. The unfixedness of the form is seen in this, that the earlier text of Layamon has both dohtere and dohtren, the later both dohtren and dohtres; the MSS. of Chaucer also show both doughtres and doughtren, Hali Meidenhad has dohtren and dehtren, the Alliterative Poems deȝter and deȝteres.

With the OE. plural forms, cf. OFris. dohtera and dohteren, OHG. tohter, tohterâ, tohterûn, MHG., with umlaut, töhter, Ger. töchter, LG. dechter. The original Teutonic nom. pl. was dohtriz*, in early Norse runes dohtriʀ, whence regularly Norse dœtr, dœttr; a corresponding OE. dœhter*, dehter* is not found, but the ME. West Midland deȝter may be its descendant. The other forms in the various languages are later, and analogical. For OE. dohtor, dohtru, -ra, see the similar forms under BROTHER: it is possible that those in -ru, -ra, northern -ero, are assimilated to -os, -or stems like lombru, -ra, -ero. ME. doȝtren, deȝtren exemplify the usual passage of vowel plurals in early southern ME. into the -en type, and Ormin's dohtress the early ascendancy of -es plurals in the north and midlands.]

17th c. See DOLPHIN.] The title of the eldest son of the King of France, from 1349 to 1830.

Originally a title attached to certain seigneuries: Dauphin of the Viennois, Dauphin of Auvergne. According to Littré, the name Dauphin, borne by the lords of the Viennois, was a proper name Delphinus (the same word as the name of the fish), whence the province subject to them was called Dauphiné. Humbert III, the last lord of Dauphiné, on ceding the province to Philip of Valois in 1349, made it a condition that the title should be perpetuated by being borne by the eldest son of the French king.

daut, dawt (dɒt), v. Sc. Also 6–8 date. [Etymology unknown.

If daut, dawt, is, as it appears to be, the proper form, it ought to represent an original dalt: cf. Sc. faut, maut, saut, etc.; but the two 16–17th c. examples of date from Scotch writers of English make even this doubtful. Dalt suggests Gael. dalta foster-child; but, though the word appears to be exclusively Scotch, there is no evidence pointing to a Gaelic origin. Connexion with DOTE, doat is excluded by the fact that Sc. au, aw, does not answer to Eng. o from any source. Cf. also DAUNT v. 6.]

II. As a period, natural division, or unit of time.

6. a. The time occupied by the earth in one revolution on its axis, in which the same terrestrial meridian returns to the sun; the space of twenty-four hours, reckoned from a definite or given point. Const. during, in, formerly on, o, a, retained in twice a day, etc.: see A *prep.*¹ 8, 8 b.

The solar day (and, formerly, the astronomical day) is reckoned from noon to noon; and, as the length of this time varies (within narrow limits) according to the time of the year, its mean or average length is the mean solar day. (The astronomical day is now reckoned from midnight to midnight.) The civil day in civilized countries generally is the period from midnight to midnight, similarly adjusted to its mean length. Ancient nations variously reckoned their day to begin at sunrise, at noon, or at sunset. The sidereal day is the time between the successive meridional transits of a star, or specifically of the first point of Aries, and is about four minutes shorter than the solar day. (The term natural day is sometimes used in this sense, sometimes in sense 1.)

5. de jure, of right, by right, according to law. Nearly always opposed to de facto; like that also (though less usually), treated as an adj. = 'legal', and placed before the sb.

II. The French preposition de, d' (də, anglicized di:, di, də), meaning 'of, from', occurring in names of places, as Ashby de la Zouch, in territorial titles, as Earl Grey de Wilton, Lord Talbot de Malahide, and in personal surnames, as De Lisle, D'Israeli, De Quincey; also, in French phrases more or less in English use, as coup d'état, coup de main, etc. (see COUP); de haut en bas, from height to lowness, condescendingly as from a lofty position, with an air of affected superiority; de nouveau, anew, afresh; de rigueur, of strictness, (a matter) strictly or rigorously obligatory, according to strict etiquette; de trop, too much, (one) too many, in the way.

de-, prefix. The Latin adverb and preposition, used in combination with verbs, and their derivatives. A large number of verbs so formed lived on in French as popular words, or were taken over into the language in earlier or later times as learned words, and thence came into English, as dēcrēsc-ĕre, décreis-tre, decrease; dēfend-ĕre, défend-re, defend; dēsīderāre, désire-r, desire. In later times English verbs, with their derivative adjectives and substantives, as also participial adjectives and substantives without any verbs, have been adapted directly from Latin, or formed from Latin elements, without the intervention of French. The following are the chief uses in Lat. and Eng.

I. As an etymological element. In the senses:

1. Down, down from, down to: as dēpendēre to hang down, DEPEND (DEPENDENT, -ENCE, etc.); dēpōnĕre to lay down, DEPONE, DEPOSE; dēprimĕre to press down, DEPRESS; dēscendĕre to climb down, DESCEND; dēvorāre to gulp down, DEVOUR. So of English formation, DEBREAK.

2. Off, away, aside: as dēclīnāre to turn aside, DECLINE; dēducĕre to lead away, DEDUCE; dēfendĕre to ward off, DEFEND; dēportāre to carry off, DEPORT; dēsignāre to mark off, DESIGNATE; dēsistĕre to stand off, DESIST.

b. Away from oneself: as dēlēgāre to make over, DELEGATE; dēprecārī to pray away, DEPRECATE.

3. Down to the bottom, completely; hence thoroughly on and on, away; also methodically, formally: as dēclāmāre to shout away, DECLAIM; dēclārāre to make quite clear, DECLARE; dēnūdāre to strip quite bare, DENUDE; dēplōrāre to weep as lost, DEPLORE; dērelinquĕre to abandon completely, DERELICT; dēspoliāre to spoil utterly, DESPOIL.

b. To exhaustion, to the dregs: as dēcoquĕre to boil down or away, DECOCT; dēliquēscĕre to melt away, DELIQUESCE.

4. In a bad sense, so as to put down or subject to some indignity: as dēcipĕre to take in, DECEIVE; dēlūdĕre to make game of, DELUDE; dērīdēre to laugh to scorn, DERIDE; dētestārī to abominate, DETEST.

5. In late L., dēcompositus was used by the grammarians in the sense 'formed or derived from a compound (word)', passing later into that of 'compounded over again, doubly or further compounded'; in this sense the word has in modern times been taken into chemistry, botany, etc. (see DECOMPOSITE, DECOMPOUND), and the prefix has been similarly used in other words, as DECOMPLEX, DEMIXTURE.

6. In Latin, dē- had also the function of undoing or reversing the action of a verb, e.g. armāre to arm, dearmāre to disarm, decorāre to grace, dēdecorāre to disgrace, jungĕre to join, dējungĕre to unyoke, vēlāre to veil, dēvēlāre to unveil, and of forming verbs of similar type from substantives, as deartuāre to dismember, from artus member, joint, dēcollāre to behead, from collum neck, dēcorticāre to deprive of bark, from corticem bark, dēflōrāre to rob of its flowers, from flōrem flower. A like notion was usually expressed in classical Latin by the prefix dis-; e.g. cingĕre to gird, discingĕre to ungird, convenīre to agree, disconvenīre to disagree, jungĕre to join, disjungĕre to disjoin, diffībulāre to unclasp, dīlōrīcāre to uncorslet, discalceātus unshod. In late L., dis-, Romanic des-, became the favoured form; and although some L. words in dē- lived on, or were by scholars adopted into the Romanic langs., all new compounds were formed with des-, and many even of the Latin words in dē- were refashioned in Romanic with des-: thus L. dearmāre, dēcarnāre, dēcolōrāre, dēcorticāre, dēdignārī, dēformāre, dēcapitāre*, Romanic desarmare, descarnare, descorticare, desdegnare, de- and des-formare, de-, descapitare, OF. desarmer, descharner, descorchier, desdaigner, de- and desformer, de-, descapiter. In later F. des- became, first in speech, and finally in writing, dé-, in which form it was identical with the dé- of learned words from L. dē-. In English, early words taken from OF. with des- retained this form (now altered back under Latin influence to dis-), as in disarm, disband, disburse, discolour, disdain, disfrock, disjoin, disrobe; but later words have de-, which, although coming from F. dé-: —OF. des-:—L. dis-, is usually viewed and treated as identical with Latin dē-; e.g. debauch, debord, defy, defile, depeople, derange, develop. In some words both forms have passed into English, as disburse, †deburse, discard, †decard, disconcert, †deconcert, disfrock, defrock. In French the prefix des-, dé-, has received an ever increasing extension as a privative, freely prefixed to verbs, as in débarasser, débrutaliser, décentraliser, déconstiper, etc., or used to form verbs of the same type from nouns, as débanquer, débonder, déchaperonner, défroquer, etc. From the free adoption of these into English, de- has here also become a living privative element, freely prefixed to verbs (esp. in -ize, -ate, -fy), and forming verbs of a similar type from substantives or adjectives. Hence:

II. As a living prefix, with privative force.

1. Forming compound verbs (with their derivative sbs., adjs., etc.), having the sense of undoing the action of the simple verb, or of depriving (anything) of the thing or character therein expressed, e.g. de-acidify to undo or reverse the acidifying process, to take away the acid character, deprive (a thing) of its acid; hence de-acidified, -fying, -fication; de-anglicize to undo the anglicizing of, to divest of its English character, render no longer English. Some of these are formed by prefixing de- to the original verb, but others are more logically analysed as formed with de- + sb. or adj. + verbal suffix, the resulting form being the same in either case. In others, again, no corresponding simple verb is in use: e.g. decephalize, decerebrize, decolourize, defibrinate. The older and more important of these words are given in their places as main words: e.g. DECHRISTIANIZE, DECOMPOSE, DEMAGNETIZE, DEMORALIZE, etc. Of others of less importance, of recent use, and of obvious meaning, examples, nearly all of the 19th c. (but decanonize 1624, decardinalize 1645), here follow.

(The hyphen is conveniently used when the de- comes before a vowel, and sometimes elsewhere to emphasize the occasional nature of the combination, or draw special attention to its composition; otherwise it is not required.)

dead, sb.[2] Also 3–6 ded, dede, 4– deid. The nothern form of DEATH sb., formerly in regular use with Northern writers (dede), and still dialectal in Scotch (deid, pronounced (di:d), esp. in certain locutions, e.g. tired to dead (deid), to be the dead (deid) of, dead-bell, dead-candle, dead-rattle, dead-spoke, dead-thraw, etc. For examples of the simple word, see the β forms under the various senses of DEATH sb.; for the combinations see under the standard English forms DEATH-BELL, DEATH-THROE, etc.

In some instances it is difficult to decide whether dead- in combination is the sb. = death, or the ordinary adj. And it is evident that later writers have often used phrases and combinations containing the sb., with the notion that it was the adj. Thus dead-bell could easily be understood as the bell of the dead, or rung for the dead, dead-sweat as the sweat characteristic of the dead.

1. A slice sawn from a log of timber (now always of fir or pine), and usually understood to be more than seven inches wide, and not more than three thick; a plank or board of pine or fir-wood.

In the timber trade, in Great Britain, a deal is understood to be 9 inches wide, not more than 3 inches thick, and at least 6 feet long. If shorter, it is a deal-end; if not more than 7 inches wide, it is a BATTEN. In N. America, the standard deal (to which other sizes are reduced in computation) is 12 feet long, 11 inches wide, and 2½ inches thick. By carpenters, deal of half this thickness (1¼ inches) is called whole deal; of half the latter (⅝ inch) slit deal.

The word was introduced with the importation of sawn boards from some Low German district, and, as these consisted usually of fir or pine, the word was from the first associated with these kinds of wood.

dean[1] (di:n). Forms: 4–5 dene, deen(e, den, 5 deyn(e (dyen), 6 Sc. dane, 5–7 deane, 7– dean. [ME. deen, dēn, a. OF. deien, dien. mod.F. doyen = Sp. and It. decano, Pg. deão, Cat. degá:—L. decān-um one set over ten (cf. Exod. xviii. 21 Vulg.), also Gr. δεκᾶνός, explained from δέκα, dec-em ten.

Whether viewed as Gr. or L., the form of the word offers difficulties. In both languages, it had also an early astrological sense, 'the chief of ten parts, or of ten degrees, of a zodiacal sign': see DECAN. Salmasius, De annis climactericis et antiqua Astrologia (Leyden, 1648), considers this the original sense, and holds it to be a term of oriental astrology, which was merely assimilated to δέκα, decem, in Gr. and L. As a military term, the Gr. derivative δεκανία occurs = L. decuria, in the Tactica of Ælian and of Arrian (both c. 120); the L. decanus occurs in Vegetius De Re Militari c. 386. The word is then used by Jerome c 400 in his translation of Exodus xviii. 21, 25, where the Old Latin had decurio; and about the same time the monastic use (sense 3 below) appears in Cod. Theodos. xvi. 5. 30, and Cassian's Instit. iv. 10. In later times of the empire it was applied to various civil functionaries. From these monastic and civil uses come all the modern senses of dean.]

5. A presbyter invested with jurisdiction or precedence (under the bishop or archdeacon) over a division of an archdeaconry; more fully called rural dean; formerly (in some cases) dean of Christianity; see CHRISTIANITY 4. (There were also urban deans (decani urbani): see Kennett Par. Antiq. II. 339.)

The rural dean had, in England till the Reformation, and in France till the Revolution, large powers of visitation, administration, and jurisdiction, which are still retained in some Roman Catholic countries. In England the office and title became almost obsolete from the 16th c., but have, since 1835, been generally revived for purposes of diocesan organization. See DANSEY, Horæ Decanicæ Rurales, 1835.

(Kennett, Du Cange, etc., have cited decanus episcopi in this sense from the 'Laws of Edward the Confessor' xxvii; but episcopi is an interpolation not in the original text, the decanus spoken of being really in sense 2 above.)

b. In the American Episcopal Church, the president of a CONVOCATION (q.v., 3 b).

6. In other ecclesiastical uses:

Dean of Peculiars: one invested with the charge of a peculiar, i.e. a particular church, parish, or group of parishes which is exempt from the jurisdiction of the bishop of the diocese within which it is situated, e.g. the Dean of Battle in Sussex. Such is also the Dean of the Chapels Royal in England (St. James's and Whitehall); in Scotland the Deans of the Chapel Royal are six clergymen of the Ch. of Scotl., who receive a portion of the revenues formerly belonging to the Chapel Royal of Holyrood.

Dean of the Arches: the lay judge of the Court of Arches, who has peculiar jurisdiction over thirteen London parishes called a deanery, and exempt from the authority of the bishop of London.

Dean of the Province of Canterbury: the Bishop of London, who, under a mandate from the archbishop, summons the bishops of the province to meet in Convocation.

7. In the colleges of Oxford and Cambridge: The title of one or more resident fellows appointed to supervise the conduct and studies of the junior members and to maintain discipline among them, to present them for graduation, etc.

The office came originally from that of the monastic dean, and was disciplinary; one important function of the dean in early times was to preside at the disputations of the scholars, and in the Oxford colleges of the new foundation deans were appointed in the different faculties, e.g. at New College, two in Arts, one in Canon Law, one in Civil Law, and one in Theology, who presided at the disputations of the students in these faculties; from the end of the 16th c., it became customary also in most colleges for the dean to present for degrees. At present the functions pertaining to discipline, attendance at chapel, graduation, etc., are sometimes discharged by a single dean, alone or in conjunction with a sub-warden, vice-president, or other vice-gerent, sometimes distributed among two or three deans; hence the offices of senior and junior dean, or sub-dean, dean of arts, dean of divinity, dean of degrees, existing in some colleges.

[In the Statutes of Merton Coll., 1267–74, such officers are appointed 'numero cuilibet vicenario vel etiam decenario,' but the title decanus is not used. 1382 *Stat. New Coll. b. ? Rare, unusual, or ? loving, kind.

1592 SHAKS. Rom. & Jul. III. iii. 28 This is deare [Qo. 1 meare] mercy, and thou seest it not.

†8. to think dear: to seem right or proper; to seem good. Const. with dative as in methinks.

B. as sb. = Dear one, darling.

This comes from A. 2 d, through intermediate uses like 'I met my dear', 'he found his dear', in which the adj., although capable of being compared ('his dearest'), can also be treated as a sb. with plural dears.

c 1400 *Destr. C. Used interjectionally. Dear!, Oh dear!, Dear, dear!, Dear me!: exclamations expressing surprise, astonishment, anxiety, distress, regret, sympathy, or other emotion. dear bless, help, love, save us (you): ejaculations of astonishment, usually implying an appeal for higher help (obs. or dial.). dear knows! goodness knows, Heaven knows (I do not).

These uses with a verb suggest that dear represents or implies a fuller dear Lord! Thus dear knows! is exactly equivalent to the Lord or God knows!; cf. also the elliptical Save us! Help us! Keep us! and the like; but the historical evidence is not conclusive. (A derivation from It. dio, God, as conjectured by some, resting upon mod. Eng. pronunciation of dea(r, finds no support in the history of the word.)

†dear, dere, a.[2] poetic. Obs. or arch. Forms: 1 dior, déor, 3–5 dere, 6–7 deere, deare, 7– dear. [OE. déor; not known in the cognate langs., and of uncertain etymology.

By some held to be intimately related to OE. déor animal (see DEER). By others thought to contain the same radical form as DEAR a.[1], and to differ only in the stem-suffix (deur-o-*). In OE., from the levelling of o- stems and jo- stems, déor was formally distinguishable from déore only in the nom. sing. (of all genders), the acc. sing. neuter, and nom. acc. pl. neuter, which had déor, as against déore, déoru (-o). Hence, when the final -e was lost or mute in ME., the two words became entirely identical in form. But in OE., their senses appear to have been quite distinct; and, in later times, the sense of dere, dear, from déor was highly incongruous with those developed from déore (though intermediate or connecting links of meaning also arose). This difference of sense is a serious objection to the view that the two words are merely different formations from the same base, as in the pairs strong strenge, weorð wierðe, etc., where the two forms agree in sense. The ultimate etymology has been discussed by Karsten, Mod. Lang. Notes, 1892, 345.

Common in OE. poetry, but found in no prose writing. In ME. poetry, not known in southern writers, but in the East-Midland Genesis & Exodus, the West Midland Allit. Poems, Gawain & Green Knight, Piers Plowman, and the metrical Destruction of Troy (all these except the first being alliterative); it then appears in Spenser (by whom it was perhaps revived), occurs frequently in Shakspere, in 17th c. poets, and archaically in Shelley. By these later writers it was probably conceived of only as a peculiar poetical sense of DEAR a.[1], and there are uses in Shakspere evidently associated with both sense-groups.]

b. Black Death, the name now commonly given to the Great Pestilence or visitation of the Oriental Plague, which devastated most countries of Europe near the middle of the 14th c., and caused great mortality in England in 1348-9; sometimes also including the recurrences of the epidemic in 1360 and 1379.

The name 'black death' is modern, and was app. introduced into English history by Mrs. Penrose (Mrs. Markham) in 1823, and into medical literature by Babington's transl. of Hecker's Der Schwarze Tod in 1833. In earlier writers we find the pestilence, the plague, great pestilence, great death, or in distinction from later visitations the furste moreyn, the first pestilence; Latin chroniclers have pestis, pestilentia, epidemia, mortalitas. The distinctive magna mortalitas, 'great mortality' or 'death', and its equivalents, prevailed in many languages: Ger. das grosse sterben, LGer. de grote dot, Flem. de groete doet, Da. den store död or mandööth, Swed. (1402) store dödhin, later stordöden, digerdöden (thick or frequent mortality), Norweg. (14th c.) manndauði hinn mikli; cf. It. mortalega grande, F. la grande peste, etc. The epithet 'black' is of uncertain origin, and not known to be contemporary anywhere. It is first found in Swedish and Danish 16th c. chroniclers (swarta dödhen, den sorte död). Hence, in German, Schlözer in 1773 used der schwarze Tod in reference to Iceland, and Sprengel in 1794 took it as a general appellation. From modern German the name has passed into Dutch (de zwaarte dood) and English, and has influenced French (la peste noire). The quots. 1758 and 1780 below are translations from Danish and Swedish through German, and refer not to the pestilence of 1348, which did not reach Iceland, but to a later visitation in 1402-3, known at the time as plagan mikli (the great plague), but called by modern Icelandic historians, from 17th c., svarti dauði (black death).

debauch (dɪ'bɔːtʃ), v. Forms: 6- debauch; 6-7 (9 Sc.) debosh, 7 debaush, debausch, debosche, 7-8 deboash, 9 Sc. debush. [a. (c 1600) F. débauch-er, in OF. desbaucher (13-14th c.) to entice away from the service of one's master, seduce from duty, etc. Of obscure derivation. The original pronunciation after modern F., and its gradual change, are seen in the spellings debosh, debaush, deboach, debauch riming in 1682 with approach: see the sb. See also DEBOISE.

F. débaucher is, according to Littré and Hatzfeld, derived from a sb. bauche, of which the precise sense and origin are according to the latter unknown; according to the former it = 'a place of work, workshop', so that desbaucher would mean orig. 'to draw away from the workshop, from one's work or duty': so Diez. Cotgr. has bauche, 'course of stones or bricks in building', baucher 'to chip, hew, or square timber, etc.; also to ranke, order, array, lay euenly'; hence desbaucher might primarily mean 'to disorder, bring into disarray or disorder'. The sense 'draw away from service or duty' appears however to be the earliest in French, though that of 'corrupt', had also been developed before the word was taken into English.]

debenture (dɪ'bɛntjʊə(r)). Also 5-7 debentur, 6-7 debenter. [In early use debentur, stated by BLOUNT in 17th c. to be the L. word debentur 'there are due or owing', supposed to have been the initial word of formal certificates of indebtedness. This is, from the early use of the term, probable; though no actual examples of documents containing the Latin formula have been found.]

1. A certificate or voucher certifying that a sum of money is owing to the person designated in it; a certificate of indebtedness.

a. A voucher given in the Royal household, the Exchequer or other Government office, certifying to the recipient the sum due to him for goods supplied, services rendered, salary, etc., and serving as his authority in claiming payment. A principal application of the word during the 17th and 18th centuries was to the vouchers given by the Ordnance Office in payment of stores.

3. A bond issued by a corporation or company (under seal), in which acknowledgement is made that the corporation or company is indebted to a particular person or to the holder in a specified sum of money on which interest is to be paid until repayment of the principal.

Not occurring in the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act of 1845, but used shortly after in connexion with the loans raised by Railway Companies and the like, the name being evidently taken from sense 2. The term is in general use, especially for those bonds by which public companies raise money at a fixed rate of interest, with a prior charge on the assets of the company or corporation issuing them.

In ME. and early mod.Eng. with many varieties of spelling, partly inherited from Fr., partly due to Eng. change of OF. ei to ai, ay, and consequent interchange of c and s, whence arose such forms as desait, Sc. desate. In OF. the spelling was sometimes assimilated to Latin decepta, as decepte, whence in Eng. deceipte. But in both langs. the p was mute; the oldest Gower MSS. have deceipte, deceite, but the word rimes with streite (strait); the ordinary 17th c. pronunciation rimed it with -ait, as in Wither a 1667 bait: deceit; cf. the common 16th c. spellings in -sait, -sate, -ceat. The narrowing of ē to ī came later. In OF. the prefix de- was sometimes changed to des- (see DE- I. 6), which became very common in ME., and was here, moreover, in the general alteration of the French form des- back to the Latin dis-, subjected to the same change, so as to give, in 15–16th c., such odd spellings as dis-ceat, dis-sait, dis-sate (all meaning (dɪ'se:t)): cf. deck (dɛk), sb.[1] Also 5 dekke, 6–7 decke. [In sense 1, app. of Flemish or LG. origin.

In sense 1, prob. a MDu. dec (neuter) roof, covering, cloak, pretext (app. from decke:—OTeut. pakjo^{m}, from same root as DECK v.): cf. Kilian 'decke operimentum, lodix = decksel operimentum, opertorium, tegumen, tegumentum, tegmen, stragulum'; also mod.Du. dek bed-covering, horse-cloth. But in the nautical sense, 2, the word is not known in Du. before 1675–81, when dek (neuter) appears as a synonym of verdek, quoted in the nautical sense in 1640, but recorded by Kilian, 1599, only in the general sense 'tegumen, velamen'. Thus, deck in the nautical sense, appears to be known in Eng. 160 years earlier than in Dutch. It may be simply a specific application of the general sense 'covering', or it may come more immediately from the MDu. sense 'roof.']

I. † 1. A covering. Obs.

2. a. Naut. A platform extending from side to side of a ship or part of a ship, covering in the space below, and also itself serving as a floor; formed of planks, or (in iron ships) of iron plating usually covered with planks.

The primary notion was 'covering' or 'roof' rather than 'floor': see quots. 1550 and 1624, and cf. 1466 in sense 1, where the 'dekke for the spynas' or pinnace, may have been a covering of canvas, tarpaulin, or the like. In early craft there was a deck only at the stern, so that 16th c. writers sometimes use deck as equivalent to poop. In Elyot (1538), whence in Cooper, Huloet, and Baret, deck is erroneously made the equivalent of prora, instead of puppis.

decoy (dɪ'kɔɪ, 'di:kɔɪ), sb.[2] Also 7 decoye, dequoy, de quoi, duckquoy, 7-8 duckoy, duck-coy, duccoy. [Decoy, in all its senses (exc. 4 a) and combinations, was preceded by a simple form COY sb.[1] (known in 1621), a. Du. kooi of the same meaning. Thus senses 1 and 3 are identical with 1 and 3 of COY; sense 2 is a fig. use of 1; 4 b. and 5 are closely related to 3. The combinations decoy-bird, -dog, -duck, -man, etc., were preceded generally by the forms coy-bird, -dog, -duck, -man, etc. It is thus evident that de-coy is a derivative, compound, or extension, of COY sb.; but the origin of the de- is undetermined.

It has been variously conjectured to be the prefix DE-, the Dutch article in de kooi 'the coy' or 'decoy', the second half of Du. eende in eende-kooi 'duck-coy', and an obscuration of duck itself in duck-coy, which is indeed found in the 17th c., and (what is notable) not merely as the sb., but as the vb. (see below). Yet we do not find it as the earlier form, which suggests that it is really a later spelling of popular etymology. The likelihood that decoy is the Du. de kooi has been forcibly urged by C. Stoffel in Englische Studien X. (1887) 180. But direct evidence is wanting. And, since DECOY sb.[1] appears to be an entirely distinct word, being much older in the language than either this word or coy itself, and was probably still in use when coy was introduced from Dutch, it is possible that the latter was made into de-coy under the influence of that earlier word. It is to be noted also that the sense 'sharper', 4 a below, actually appears earlier than any other, literal or figurative, and may possibly not be a sense of this word at all, but an independent and earlier cant or slang term; if so, it may also have influenced the change of coy to decoy.]

1. A pond or pool out of which run narrow arms or 'pipes' covered with network or other contrivances into which wild ducks or other fowl may be allured and there caught.

4. Applied to a person:

†a. A swindler, sharper; an impostor or 'shark' who lives by his wits at the expense of his dupes. Obs.

(It is, from the early date and sense, very doubtful if this belongs to this word. In the ' character' by Brathwait (quot. 1631), there is no reference explicit or implicit to the action of a decoy-duck. It rather looks as if this were a slang term already in use when coys and coy-ducks were introduced into England, and as if coy-duck were changed into decoy-duck with allusion to this.)

Decree is still used in Admiralty cases. In Divorce cases, a decree is an order of the Court declaring the nullity of dissolution of marriage, or the judicial separation of the parties. decree nisi: the order made by the court for divorce, which remains conditional for at least six months, after which, unless cause to the contrary is shown, it is made absolute. In Ecclesiastical cases, decree is a special form of citation of the party to the suit.
